I have some old databases, and have been manually creating a dump on the 1st of each month to restore new databases. I've hit a road block: Is there a tool out there that will automatically create the dump for the next day that the Database is accessed on, so that I only have to worry about one day of a month? A: There is one in the PostgreSQL core code. If you have a recent version of PostgreSQL, there is a pg_basebackup utility in contrib/ that can do it. It is a wrapper around backuppc, which is an old backup tool written in C. Q: Some query string values lost to the ether I have a form on a site: That is not having any problems executing. I log the $_GET values and they come back ok. However, what I see on the server is: except for the user_id, the iframes and the return. The rest of the http request (like the POST) is gone. No-one on the webserver team is around, any ideas? A: This looks like a result of some sort of caching
